ther opportunity, like Rumania's, lies with the Entente.

Germany became suspicious of Rumania several months ago. The presence of Mackensen in the Balkans is the best proof that Berlin feared the worst. The campaign is bound to develop rapidly and on a big scale.

Bugaria is immediately menaced on two fronts—one of which is especially vulnerable, the Dobrudja—while Rumania can assist the Russians in attacking Hungary from the south and around Czernowitz. The Russians can now join the Rumanians in driving in a wedge to meet the Salonica forces. On the other hand, Mackensen is not likely to remain idle long. He has been preparing a long time for a drive in the Balkans.
